history

Too little is known about the history of this game. We know it is a traditional game played in the island of Java, in Indonesia, and that it is almost unknown outside of it.

It is not easy to find Permainan's place among other board games, because its common features, like a board made up from crossing lines and the simple orthogonal or diagonal movement are too common and were reinvented several times across the globe.

On the other hand, the way the pieces are captured and the loops that extend from the board are almost unique, making comparisons difficult. We do know, however, that a few variations of Permainan do exist in rural places in China and Korea.

The game was named "Surakarta" by foreigners, after an ancient city of Java, the "Roundabouts", so it sounded less exotic to English speaking people. Its native name, Permainan, simply means "the game".

Each player must place his pins on one side of the board, on top of the circles. Pieces are placed on the vertices of the crossing lines, not on the squares.

Players must decide who will move first, and then they alternate turns. In its basic movement, each pin must move one point either orthogonally or diagonally, but may not go through the loops, may not occupy a position already occupied by another piece and may not capture.

In order to capture, you may move a pin any number of points in a direction, either up, down, left or right, but no diagonals. When performing this move, you not only may but you must go through at least one loop, and finally land on a point occupied by an opponent's pin, capturing it and taking it out of the game. Capture is an optional move.

The winner is the player who can capture all of the opponent's pins. If it comes to a situation where no player can capture any more pins, the game ends and the winner is the one with more pins on the board. Usually, Permainan players will agree on how many games they will play beforehand, and the winner is actually the one who have won most games.
